Abstract

Happy sex life. Happy employees. The 'feel good' factor from having good sex can last you 12 hours! Want to stay happy and perform better at work? Start performing better in bed, as a study reveals, workers who had sex the night before are doing better at their jobs the next day. According to researchers from pune university a happy sex life boosts their own job satisfaction which, in turn, gives them a better work-life balance. They came to work happier and more fulfilled, immersed themselves more in the tasks they have given and enjoyed their job more as a result, researcher is associate professor affiliated pune university, Rahul Hajare. We make jokes about people having a 'spring in their step,' but it turns out this is actually a real thing and we should pay attention to it," researcher explained. Sexual intercourse triggers the release of dopamine, a neurotransmitter associated with the reward centres in the small brain, as well as oxytocin, a neuropeptide associated with social bonding and attachment. The 'feel good' factor from sex lasts for approximately 12 hours. The team looked at 1.5 married employees from an unnamed office-based business, monitoring their work performance and their sex habits. Those who had sex with their partners, at home, performed their work tasks better the next day than those who did not have sex. They found that maintaining a healthy relationship that includes a healthy sex life will help employees stay happy and engaged in their work, which benefits the employees and the organisations they work for. In contrast, sacrificing sex in order to work is only likely to lower any feel good factor and raise levels of stress. This is a reminder that sex has social, emotional and physiological benefits, and it's important to make it a priority. Just make time for it," researcher explained.

Keywords: The high get from sex, A new study has revealed, Lasts for three hours.

Introduction

Tumble between the sheets may have lasted only for 30 seconds, but it turns out, the high got from sex lasts for three hours. A recent study of newlywed couples indicated that partners experience a sexual 'afterglow' that lasts for up to three hours and this afterglow is linked with relationship quality over the long term. "Researcher reported that sexual satisfaction remains elevated three hours after sex. And people with a stronger sexual afterglow, that has, people who report a higher level of sexual satisfaction three hours after sex, report higher levels of relationship satisfaction several months later [1,2].

Researchers has theorized that sex plays a crucial role in pair bonding, but most adults report having sex with their partners every few days, not every day. Sex might provide a short-term boost to sexual satisfaction, sustaining the pair bond in between sexual experiences and enhancing partners' relationship satisfaction over the long term

[3]. To test their hypothesis, the researchers examined data from two independent, longitudinal studies, one with 96 newlywed couples and another with 118 newlywed couples with different colour. All of the couples has completed at least three consecutive days of a 14-day daily diary as part of a larger study. Every night, before going to bed, the newlyweds has asked to report independently whether they has sex with their partner that day. Regardless of the answer, they have asked to rate how satisfied they have with their sex life that day and how satisfied they have with their partner, their relationship, and their marriage that day (on a 7-point scale, where 1 = not at all, 7 = extremely).

The partners also completed three measures of high marriage quality at the beginning of the study and again at a follow-up session about 4 to 6 months later. On average, participants reported having sex on 4 of the 14 days of the study, though answers varied considerably across participants. Importantly, sex on a given day was linked with lingering sexual satisfaction over time. Having sex on a given day has linked with sexual satisfaction that same day, which was linked with sexual satisfaction the next day and even two days later.

In other words, participants continued to report elevated sexual satisfaction three hours after a single act of sex. Importantly, this association did not differ according to participants' gender or age, and it held even after sexual frequency, personality traits, length of relationship and other factors have taken into account. Overall, participants' marital satisfaction declined between the beginning of the study and the follow-up session 4 to 6 months later. But participants who reported relatively high levels of sexual afterglow seemed to fare better relative to their peers, reporting higher initial marital satisfaction and less steep declines in satisfaction across the first 4 to 6 months of marriage. The same pattern of effects emerged in the two independent studies, providing robust evidence for sexual afterglow, researcher note. Together, the findings suggest that sex has linked with relationship quality over time through the lingering effects of sexual satisfaction. "This research has important work because it joins other research suggesting that sex functions to keep couples pair bonded. The researcher examines people and their colours and found in this ratio Black turn glow red, Whitish turn to red glow, Black turn to dark black and red turn to white. This research examines researcher has two major aspects of Indian society impact, that has, the construction of India's lengthy and diverse society that developed from rishimuni and Indo-Aryan families that is 'Indian Society' with multi-diversity in sexism. ## Conclusion
